The history of the Manhattan project and its successful creation of the atomic bomb during World War II has been well documented. It is not well known however that a separate and crucial part of this project was carried out by the US Navy at its Naval Research Laboratory in Washington DC. This project led by the young physicist Philip Abelson devised a novel liquid thermal diffusion process for separating the fissionable ²³⁵U from ²³⁸U. Eventually this process was used. This account of the life of Philip Abelson by his nephew John is thoroughly charming. It is full of the kind of details that make it read like a fine novel. I would recommend it to anyone. — David L.
